How to Scaffold Content for Academic Success

BY MARCIA CARTER, ANITA HERNANDEZ, AND JEANNINE RICHISON

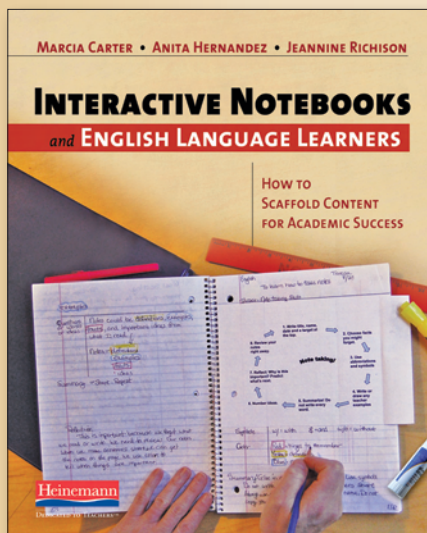

Interactive Notebooks are gaining popularity in English classes nationwide. These student-created, teacher-directed notebooks help all students, but they are ideal for English learners. With Interactive Notebooks and English Language Learners you'll see how easy the Notebook is to implement and why it makes such a difference.

The Interactive Notebook scaffolds content and gives students the space to develop school-based ways of thinking—to go from English language learners to academic language learners. With Interactive Notebooks and English Language Learners, you'll see what an effective tool the Notebook is for:

- scaffolding content so English learners develop and access background knowledge more readily
- increasing English learners' facility with academic language
- engaging all students actively and improving their notetaking and retention abilities
- working with parents to add another layer of support for classroom goals
- assessing student learning and progress authentically, encouraging self-monitoring, and planning further instruction.

With instructions for launching the Notebook, student examples, and advice on sequencing and planning, Interactive Notebooks and English Language Learners has everything you need to get going and be successful in supporting English learners' acquisition of Academic English.

Teaching secondary students in the content areas is hard enough under the best of circumstances. When students are not well prepared academically and also lack academic literacy skills, the challenge can seem overwhelming. Fortunately, the Freemans help secondary content-area teachers provide these students with the academic support they very desperately need.
