Have you ever wondered why people are late? I have. I've never known a person who's never been late. Most of the time, lateness will start from earlyness. For example, let's say you wake up on a Saturday morning at 7:00. You have to get to a doctor's appointment at 10:00, which is only 3 blocks away. So you relax and turn on the tv, only to find a repeated award show which is 4 hours long. By the time the award show is over, you've completely forgotten about your doctor's appointment and get there at 1:00. See, there's no maybe you will wake up again on a Saturday at 1:00 and you need to get to a birthday party at 2:30. You are in a lot of trouble so you through the only skirt you can find, which has way too many holes and you run out the door. You get to the party at 1:10 and no one's there. Luckily, there is Dominos across the street. So you walk over to get some lunch and by the time it's 2:30 you're started eating your second slice. So lateness can come from lateness to earlyness to lateness again. Carpools are morning lateness machines. Let's say it's Tuesday morning and you wake up very early to have a conference at work with a client. Everyone in your party is early except for your arch enemy secretary Jan, who thinks a 2 hour showers are normal! So basically it's almost impossible not to be late, unless of course you're early!
